Recent advances in technology have led to the development of many new personal care products to provide not only a clean, drug-free environment for consumers, but also to enhance the cleaning and soiling removal performances of such products. This paper examines three types of consumer-oriented personal care products that are based on a variety of technologies and that differ from each other in the type of active ingredients, delivery mechanisms, and thereby strengths. Accordingly, this paper focuses on the development of five distinct personal care products and discuss their design criteria and challenges and the potential challenges and enabling
