of the M2/M4-selective muscarinic receptor antagonist AF-DX116 on oxidative stress and visual function in experimental glaucoma. To determine whether pre-treatment with a M2/M4-selective muscarinic receptor antagonist protects against the development of early glaucomatous damage and whether it improves visual function in experimental glaucoma. Glaucoma was induced in Sprague-Dawley rats by laser photocoagulation of the trabecular meshwork. Animals received daily intraperitoneal injections of AF-DX116 (at 2 mg/kg) or vehicle starting at 2 or 10 weeks after laser treatment.

Oxidative damage was measured by lipid peroxidation and the levels of reduced glutathione (GSH), oxidized glutathione (GSSG), superoxide dismutase (SOD), and catalase. Central visual function was measured by electroretinography (ERG) and automated perimetry. AF-DX116 treatment decreased lipid peroxidation and oxidized GSH levels and increased GSH levels and SOD and catalase activities in retinas subjected to laser. These effects were already detected at 2 weeks and were maintained to the end of the study. AF-DX116 improved both ERG and automated perimetry deficits in animals receiving laser treatment at 2 weeks. At the later time point, neither ERG nor automated perimetry effects were observed. AF-DX116 protected against early glaucomatous damage and improved visual function at early stages of the disease. The lack of effect at later stages of the disease may be due to reduced M2/M4 mus 1cb139a0ed
