Five years after Obamacare's birth, voters may decide on its death "Obamacare" is the word most commonly uttered in conversation these days, but the Affordable Care Act is a lot more than that. It was passed during an election year, despite Obama's call for the public to wait a few years for health reform. It eventually was signed into law in 2010. Five years later, the national conversation about health care isn't about Obamacare at all, it's about repealing Obamacare. At the White House last week, when asked about the law, Sen. Mary Landrieu said it was going to be up to voters in November to decide its fate. "The Supreme Court said it was Congress' role, not my role to decide what's best for my constituents," Landrieu said at a news conference. "They'll make that decision in the fall." But it's not as simple as that. Landrieu is right that what the Supreme Court told Congress was that the federal government could not force states to expand Medicaid. But her constituents voted against that in November 2006 and April 2008 and even though it was a gubernatorial election year, Landrieu didn't run again after that. And in the five years since the Medicaid expansion happened, the federal government has spent billions of dollars in Louisiana to make sure that it had the money to pay for the program. Even more telling, even in a state that's been counted on to vote Democratic for years, the Republican governor of Mississippi, Phil Bryant, signed it
