The AGG-92 Hog 88 Heavy Machine Gun Tank Destroyer from Germany, modified to fire the U.S. 57 mm M43 High Velocity Tank Gun in addition to German manufactured 7.5 cm Pak 38 anti-tank guns, mounts on the chassis of one Panther tank and an armored recovery vehicle. While the German army didn't face a serious threat from Panzer tanks during World War II, a German equivalent to the Soviet T-34 Tank in the relatively more open Eastern Front was the German Tiger Tank. The Tiger, armed with 88 mm armor-piercing ammunition, was built with a thick steel turret that was extremely well protected. With the debut of the A-34 Matilda Infantry Tank in 1941, the Panzerjäger battalions with their half-track AAG-92s mounted on Panzer IVs, became the primary anti-tank arm of the Wehrmacht, as well as being used for other roles (like the anti-aircraft variant). An early AAG-92 mounted on Panzer IV, with a Pak 38. (via Wikimedia Commons) The AAG-92 took just a few weeks to redesign to fire the 57 mm AT gun. The AAG-92 fired the 57 mm AT gun on the gun shield, which ensured that crew and vehicle could be safe from enemy fire. It was only in 1943 that a turret with a 68 mm gun was made available, but few were ever built. The AAG-92 was slow at time of designing and production, and it was not a popular weapon with the German army, but due to its dual use, it was used in North Africa during World War II. Early work on dual purpose weapons took place during World War I, and there were also some modern examples in the British "H" series of tanks. By the late 1930's, the French had created a tank destroyer version of the Renault FT which mounted the Hotchkiss machine gun in a turret that could also house additional machine guns and a flame thrower.
