They were the only vessels designed by Henry Heathcoat in his role as Chief Constructor to the Royal Navy. Background With the establishment of the Royal Navy in the 1840s, and the subsequent end of the Napoleonic Wars, there was a shortage of small vessels. In 1848, London Dock Commissioners turned to the Royal Dockyards to supply a number of small vessels for construction on the high seas, including a ship of the line. A number of small vessels were ordered from Heathcoat's own yard at Woolwich, one of them a barge with a short forecastle. However, in 1846, a similar class of vessels had been designed and approved by Lord John Russell for the Royal Australian Navy. These vessels proved a great success, and eight were built for the service. However, these vessels were smaller than the originally approved

The management of decompressive craniectomy after traumatic brain injury (TBI) is one of the most challenging tasks for neurosurgeons. While there are established indications for decompression of hematoma, contusions, and lacerations in TBI, there are many controversies regarding the use of decompressive craniectomy for raised intracranial pressure (ICP). Three indications for decompressive craniectomy are (1) refractory elevation in ICP even after large craniectomy with removal of life-threatening mass lesions, (2) malignant brain edema of unknown etiology, and (3) persistent severe but not life-threatening TBI. Despite the lack of scientific evidence for the benefits of decompressive craniectomy, there is a widespread belief that TBI patients should undergo decompressive craniectomy for all eligible indications. Decompressive craniectomy can be life-saving in some refractory cases with a life-threatening mass lesion, but it has life-shortening effects in many other cases. Decompressive craniectomy after TBI is recommended only in an appropriate indication and those who undergo decompressive craniectomy should receive standardized protocols to reduce the occurrence of adverse events. We present a review on the current medical literature on the surgical management of TBI, especially with reference to decompressive craniectomy. Joss Whedon's The Avengers 2 will begin filming next month, and it is not yet clear exactly where the movie might be located. A new report, however, suggests that the production will probably take place in Vancouver, British Columbia
