What's new:

Sorry if this has been asked already, but I can't seem to find it: So you've decided to retire/hibernate at a certain age. So you have a number of years of "sport clothing/car ready," but after that, you're going to have to rely on the hundred dollar lottery. Considering that your body, in a world where all diseases are a thing of the past, could live forever, does this mean your life will mirror your body's natural biological trend? ie. Will your lungs collapse in 15 years, as they do naturally? Will your brain develop dementia as opposed to being in a state of equally distributed regenerative flux? I'm really not trying to be rude, but when your mind is more interested in sports memorabilia and the ability to do as you please, and by the looks of your Facebook profile, you're more concerned about your abs than your brain, I'm worried. A: Well, if we're assuming that most of the possible mutations that can cause atrophy of the lungs have already occurred naturally, then probably. If we're assuming that said mutations are so devastating as to cause you to die of respiratory failure in fifteen years, though... well, maybe not. I am not personally aware of a case of a naturally occurring neurological condition that manifests as Alzheimer's disease (or a variant thereof) in the general population; though, there's some evidence that there are occasional cases of that in the world, the exact cause and phenotype isn't clear. However, there are a few cases of familial dementia that show similar symptoms, but those have been linked to mutations in a specific gene that cause Alzheimer's disease. From that, the family trees of those people cannot be followed back to the original mutation, and the person would have to run into more relatives with similar symptoms and receive some medical attention to notice that something is amiss. On the whole, I'd hazard to guess that most of the mutations that cause degeneration in the rest of the brain would likely result in some form of dementia, though. Additionally, everything that results in degeneration in your brain will usually lead to other undesirable effects. There are a few in the brain that are important for proper coordination that result in such problems as spasticity, tremors, even seizures - though the more complicated and/or higher-intensity of damage tends to be more noticeable. Degeneration of the brain itself due to many mutations
