I'm using the locator pad from for all of my calculations. As you can see I have the distance, bearing and a starting point (this object has all the elements that I need). The distance to the destination is already known and I only need the bearing. I've found this question on the forum, but was unable to make it work: How to calculate the heading for a location with JS? Here is my function: function calcHeading(distance, bearing, start) { var heading = 0; while(heading < 80) { heading = heading + 90; } } return bearing; } So my question is how do I use this function to get the bearing of the object? A: You don
