Climate warming is projected to alter ecosystem carbon fluxes and thus affect terrestrial carbon budgets, but the effects of this change on respiration remain poorly known. In this study, we investigated how strong warming affects daily soil respiration. Soil temperature, soil water content, and CO₂ efflux from soil surface were monitored in a grassland at the western margin of the Tibetan Plateau, China, during 2011-2013. We then simulated whole-year CO₂ fluxes for this site based on daily measurements by performing regional atmospheric calculations. We found that daytime soil respiration increased linearly with temperature and peaked on days with the lowest soil water contents. Net ecosystem exchange responded positively to temperature in the growing season only, but did not exhibit a positive relationship in the non-growing season.
