In a world first, this technology will be used to allow coaches to identify the most important player in a game. This will impact training regimes, where analysts and coaches can access a player's data based on their position on the pitch to fine-tune their training and preparation. A match-based console in-game training feature is also included, which helps players prepare for a game against CPU-controlled opponents by offering drills and game simulations, which will be adjusted based on the data collected from the full-intensity match. Players will also have the option of training with smaller groups of opposition players, enabling them to replicate the intensity and pressure of playing in a competitive match. An official of FIFA, the world's biggest video game, said the gameplay feature was an innovation that will help the game advance further into modern times. "The academy is the backbone of any football club. Creating an engaging, realistic environment for the player to train is of paramount importance for the future of the game and FIFA 20 demonstrated this with its legendary FIFA eWorlds. FIFA 22 plans to continue on this path and provide players with a competitive environment outside of the training pitch that pushes them mentally and physically to the limit," said Federico Franchi, Executive Producer. FIFA 22 marks the 21st year of the internationally-acclaimed franchise that has sold more than 220 million units and spawned multiple spin-offs and games based on the core FIFA gameplay. The game will be available in the EMEA territories starting on PlayStation 4 and PC, and worldwide starting March 21. You can follow the development progress on the official Twitter account: @FIFAEsports. "Because it's not going to happen for everyone." He's talking about designing schools that can let students escape the monotony of high school, of course, but also the rat race of a young adult's day.
