Overcoming the cognitive deficiencies of older adults with Alzheimer's disease and related dementias (ADRD) represents one of the greatest challenges for science and society today. It is estimated that by 2050, one in 85 Americans will have ADRD and the demand for health services will significantly increase. Currently there are no effective medications for ADRD and the cost of care is expected to rise to over $2.6 trillion by 2050. Thus, there is a great need to establish effective approaches for counteracting the cognitive decline in ADRD. L-theanine is an amino acid that is naturally present in tea and that has been demonstrated to have neuroprotective effects and to aid in cognitive function in older adults. However, the effect of L-theanine on cognitive decline in ADRD has not been studied. The primary goal of this research is to examine the effects of L-theanine on cognitive function in older adults with ADRD. To achieve this goal the main hypothesis of this project is that L-theanine improves cognitive function in older adults with ADRD. In addition, it is hypothesized that the mechanism of action of L-theanine is mediated by L-theanine's effect on neurotransmitters, particularly acetylcholine (ACh). To test the main hypothesis, a double-blind, randomized, placebo-controlled, crossover study is proposed. Twenty-eight older adults with mild to moderate ADRD will be recruited to participate in the study. Participants 6d1f23a050
