with the right skills and a bit of time and patience, i can learn to crash, and that's it. i'm going to learn & learn. if you are beginning in simulation flying, and find yourself maxing out your credit card, i suggest that you download aerofly fs 2 and start with the easy stuff. once you've found a good pocket money activity & mastered the most difficult part of the sim, you can start renting the new sim and invest in the increased feature set. how do i connect, for example, the data such as, the stroke, throttle & rpm pedals? what settings do i need for my simulated engine? what are the limits & what are my flight envelope? my mental modeling skill goes through the roof. the new simulator is not easy to grasp, because there is a steep learning curve. this is the most difficult part. especially those who love flying, this is definitely the game to play. the aerofly 2 flight simulator offers a lot of content. you can fly both under the weather & in the clear sky. if you are equipped with the flight dynamics settings, you can even fly without instrumentation. in-air targets, crosswinds, gusts & turbulence are very useful. whoops, i dented that right wing, time to save the aircraft. the message "can not report flight over an airfield" is in several languages. cool - but it's not appropriate for an open cockpit. one of the most important settings of the new simulator is the simulator type. here, you can choose between flight stabilizer, gyro-tracker, or stick-flight. if you are not using a simulator, i strongly recommend you to increase this. the sim is very good, with a smooth frame rate, the controls are easy to use. also, the radar system is very robust. this system detects numerous obstacles and also other aircraft, based on its technology. one of the most important features, however, is the cockpit view. it was easy to adjust the view - all with one finger, and the frame rate was nice. if you are flying for fun, it is possible to lower the cockpit view to all four of the frame. if you are a pilot, you will very fast be immersed in the cockpit of the airplane. 5ec8ef588b
