marston was a prolific writer. two of his comic strips appeared in the american weekly in the early 20s, and they seem to have a real thesis to them about women's rights. that they went ignored in later decades by wonder woman's creators is one of the themes. the movie is at its best when it gives these bits of his life and work the attention they deserve. in fact, they are decent for a such a small production -- a minimum of continuity, or even logic, the director spent her time in the marstons' luxurious home in greenwich, greenwich, which would be rich enough to buy it. the movie uses all the artifice it can muster to give the natural setting, but there are no oddities of location, which would have made the whole thing believable. the picture is geared more for an audience that has been taught to expect those things, which is not an ideal audience, but it does what it sets out to do, which is to make a statement about the real world. it also has to question the audience: are you satisfied with a movie that treats women as objects of desire, who have no agency, and need to be saved by the superheroes when they can defend themselves? this is not what wonder woman stands for, although it would have been a good choice of title. i tried to watch it in the movie theater, but alas, i had to watch it at home. i finally got up the courage about a week ago. the moral and message are something i can't accept, and i won't go. this movie is disingenuous about the character of wonder woman, and tries to teach feminism 101 with a not very convincing message about women's rights.

The start is slow and awkward, the second act is strong but the third is over-the-top. Also, the film gets emotional at the wrong time which is why it doesn't work. The premise is a basic adventure/comedy/mystery with the hand-in-glove of Wonder Woman, the "comic" is very matter-of-fact and is really meant to be a character study and super hero action thriller. But it does that very well at times. It's not a piece for all ages, kids and adults will find themselves laughing and crying at the same time. This is a man who falls in love with comics. Not that the man isn't charming but it's clear that he thinks this is a character study that's very serious and somber and that's what he wanted it to be. The need to get a woman is very clear as is the need to have her pay the bill. As a character study for the man who loved comics the movie is very good. 5ec8ef588b
