free download Geek A personal computer geek (or simply geek, as used informally by some people) is a person who is interested or knowledgeable about computers. In other words, a geek is someone who shows a proclivity for seeking technical details about computers, building and repairing them, and learning about how they work. The title of Computer Geek was established as a generic term, similar to Astrophysicist for astronomy or Chemist for chemistry, and was chosen by a vote amongst the then editors of the magazine. Although intended to cover a broad range of computer topics, the magazine (and genre) is most noted for its coverage of computer hardware and software topics. This usage of the word "geek" is somewhat distinct from "hardware hacker", which is the use of computers for non-hobbyist purpose; for example, writing software. Geek culture

Computer geeks share a common culture which is influenced by the study and practice of computer science. Many computer geeks like technology as a hobby, as well as a source of entertainment. In many cases the culture has led to the development of computer programming as a hobby in and of itself. Some computer geeks may strive to build a personal computer which is suitable for a wide variety of computing and entertainment uses. Computer geeks are generally regarded as being friendly and open-minded, which is attributed to the nature of technology and technology culture. Many times it is considered not only acceptable, but even expected, that a computer geek will comment on a blog, web site or forum. This is due to the geek's desire to learn about technology and to contribute technology-related information and opinion to the wider community. History According to Isaac Asimov, the first geek was the mad scientist Hans von Helmholtz, who constructed a pendulum-and-tape recorder apparatus in the 1860s. In 1980, computer science professor William A. Fitch coined the term "computer geek" as a description of the "computer hobbyists", after noting that in use the term "hacker" by the general public was synonymous with "cracker" (though most hackers and crackers scoff at the negative connotations). Fitch further stated that "a geek is primarily an
