According to Adobe, this was because of performance and quality issues with the new application. However, problems surfaced far sooner. For example, when I was editing images, Lightroom would crash whenever I focused on a live website or app. The crash would throw an error message: "Lightroom crashed while processing one of your documents." The document concerned would only be one image, for instance, and its image processing would immediately be paused, and, when I humored the error, I would lose precious clients. That could have been fixed easily if the problem was caused by memory leaks. However, upgrading some underlying piece of memory-intensive software on my Mac solved the problem. It was in doing so that I found out, to my surprise and a great relief, that Lightroom 5.0 was still compatible with Classic. A roundabout way to making sure your old photos were compatible with the new software was to import them into Lightroom 5.0. However, in bloopers mode, it is easier to determine compatibility by simply starting Lightroom, and, if you see the full screen splash screen, your photos are compatible. Within Lightroom 5, I could see the classic interface with its simple, elegant design. It closely resembles the design of Adobe Bridge, but is unique in that it possesses none of the classic program's idiosyncrasies. I appreciate the fact that this version of Lightroom is, like the first Lightroom, designed with creative professionals in mind. It has all the tools they need. I still miss some aspects of previous versions. In particular, I miss the full screen settings and the many selections, which were seamlessly integrated into the interface. However, my initial impression was that Lightroom 5.0 is, overall, definitely good. (note: Click here to see Lightroom 5.0 in action)
